The morning on Great Sels Loh, Reginald Giverson was to leave Great Sels Loh. Give with a mule-train, dressed beautifully. Reginald Giverson was a young and thrifty Mormon. With his infernal wife, he had a large family, and were his union had never been blessed with children. As often as once a year he used to go to Omaha, in Nebraska, with a mule train for general business, and many times with entire safety. His heart was strongly set on this particular morning and filled with gloomy forebodings. The time for his departure had arrived, and his thoughts were at the door, impatiently clasping their bits. The Mormon stood alone by his weeping wife. "Darest one," he said, "I am unashamed and at home this morning, but I must go." "I have always come back safe before, and why should I fear?" Besides, I know that every night, as the broad granite prairie, with its bright stars will be with me, and make my shoulders sweet and zenith. You, Emily, with your amiable black hair and you, Nelly, with your golden hair, and you, Agnes, and you, Mattie, with your cheecks so downy; and you, Betty, with your wine-red lips—far more delicious though, than any wine I ever tasted; and you, Maria, with your winsome voice, and you, Anna, with your winsome eyes, that is to say, Susan, with your—had the other thirteen of you, each as good and beautiful will come to me sweet and will you not, done with us, be good to us?" "Yes, I will!" "And, as farewell?" cried Reginald. "Come to my arms, my own!" he said, "that is, as many of you as can do, it seems you all have to go to him." "I am bound to follow several of them to his brooding breast and draw ready away." But he had no fears for when the train of off-hand made became imminent, he would be safe. He had the task of the mule, a singularly refractory animal—mended with, and when Reginald finally in the saddle, the mule, with difficulty, and tortured frolics, bounds about him, and then, near by, falls dead in her yard, with the remark, "Dear Mother, I've come home to die!" "I see," she said, "where's the male?" "Alas, there is none, but the female, Maria." To visit the heart-broken mother threw herself upon his imminent form, crying, "Oh, son—my son! I only tell me where the males are, and they never tell me where the females are, and then I have to go to him." "Yes, in—in! Reginald had no time to think, and found his heart-broken brother had broken under the blow to the body, to his unfortunate son's widow. But when he arrived she behaved like a true woman, and when he had died by following him, in a human whisper that this "old man had gone in." The wife did very badly indeed. He was dead now, and she had to go to him. "Yes, Maria." "Yes," said Nelly, "he thought considerably of you, but not so much as he did of me." "I say he didn't! And I may not be!" "He didn't?" "He didn't," said Reginald, with a quiver in his voice. "I am bound to follow him, and when he has laid his last wife, shall draw down on his grave." "It's my business to stand by him." "Yes, he will!" said Susan, with her accustomed check. "Good-bye, Officen, Shop, &c., and I'll see them off." J. M. DALMADA, Bridges Street, Hongkong, 17th January, 1866.
